

Maverik Bull Article #4

By, James Elmo Palmer The Beadfather

Originally published 1/12/2000

www.maveriks.com

Once again the school year has started for some of us. Seems like everything revolves around school. There are really only a few precious years where education is not a factor in one's life. I would dare say that even when formal education is absent, there is some hobby or fascination which we choose to enhance with our free time. After work, one comes home and flies kites or reads about certain plants they are growing in their gardens. A lot of you are thinking, "Who is writing this article? Does Beads have any grasp on reality or even know who his audience is?" You just think about it. Maybe gardening or kite flying isn't your thing, but there is something. Who knows what it will be in a couple of years.

Interesting thing, this seeming necessity to learn. We are not static creatures, nor are we capable of holding to one position very long. It is either forward or backward, up or down, right or left, but there is always motion. So, what prompts this learning? Can we not say that it is indeed part of our eternal nature, a gift from the Creator? A part of the Creator Himself? Whatever the case may be, it is an asset that should not be overlooked. Truly, knowledge is power. What kind of power do we wish to wield? Formal education is only part of the equation for some of us and not at all for others, however, increased knowledge is a necessity for all.

Does it matter what you decide to study? No. Learn computers, learn sports, learn history, learn. And once you have exhausted one subject, move to the next one. Complacency will kill you. Learn through experience, through research, through another's mistakes. Learn from your own mistakes. Then, once knowledge is gained, ask yourself this question, "What know will I do with what I know?" Something to think about.